Background of Alexander Hamilton and John Laurens

The relationship between Alexander Hamilton and John Laurens began during the American Revolutionary War, a defining conflict in the history of the United States. Hamilton, an ambitious young officer and future Founding Father, first met Laurens, a South Carolina native and ardent abolitionist, while serving in the Continental Army. Both men were aides-de-camp to General George Washington, which placed them in close proximity and fostered a strong bond. Their friendship was rooted in shared revolutionary ideals and a mutual commitment to the cause of American independence.

Biographical Overviews

Alexander Hamilton was born in the West Indies and rose to prominence as a talented soldier, statesman, and architect of the American financial system.

John Laurens, born into a wealthy South Carolina family, was known for his fervent opposition to slavery and his dedication to revolutionary principles. Their contrasting backgrounds—Hamilton's Caribbean origins and Laurens's Southern aristocracy—did not hinder their close friendship but rather enriched their correspondence with diverse perspectives.

The Military Context

Serving under General Washington, both Hamilton and Laurens participated in key battles and campaigns throughout the revolution. Their military experiences frequently influenced their letters, as they shared updates, strategic thoughts, and personal reflections from the front lines.
