The filmmakers intentionally selected these languages to authentically represent the cultures of the Pacific Islands, which inspired the story's setting and characters. The soundtrack's lyricist and composer collaborated with native speakers to incorporate these languages accurately within the songs.

Cook Islands Maori

Cook Islands Maori is the most prominent language featured in the film's songs. It is an Eastern Polynesian language spoken in the Cook Islands and shares similarities with New Zealand Maori, Hawaiian, and Tahitian. Songs like “Logo Te Pate” and parts of “We Know the Way” include lyrics in Cook Islands Maori, highlighting rhythmic patterns and vocabulary unique to this language group.

Samoan and Tahitian Influences

In addition to Cook Islands Maori, some lyrics and vocalizations draw from Samoan and Tahitian languages. These languages contribute to the broader Polynesian soundscape and help create a cohesive musical homage to the Pacific region. While less prominent than Cook Islands Maori, their inclusion enriches the cultural tapestry represented in the soundtrack.

Cultural Significance of the Polynesian Languages

The use of Polynesian languages in Moana’s songs is not merely decorative but serves to honor and preserve the linguistic heritage of the Pacific Islands. These languages carry centuries of history, mythology, and tradition, all of which are central to the film’s narrative themes of identity, exploration, and connection to ancestry.
